We were supposed to be living in a wireless future, but we're not quite there yet. Still, many things we do with cables don't actually require cables anymore — you can go wire-free with just a few tweaks. There are still reasons you might feel you have to connect your phone to your computer or plug in a cable, but those can be avoided with these tricks. Wireless File Transfers RELATED: How to Send Text Messages From Your PC With Your Android Phone AirDroid can be used for many things, including texting via your Android phone on your PC like Apple's iMessage. However, AirDroid also includes a file manager. That file manager allows you to wirelessly transfer files back and forth — for example, moving music files to your phone or transferring photos to your computer — via a web browser or desktop app. It all works entirely wirelessly, and it can work entirely over a local Wi-Fi connection. It basically turns your Android phone into a little web server when you have the application running. Use Dropbox, Google Drive, OneDrive, and Other Cloud Storage Services Rather than using an app like AirDroid, you can always just rely on the cloud storage service of your choice instead — that means something like Dropbox, Google Drive, or Microsoft's OneDrive. Upload a file to your cloud storage from your phone — possibly using the convenient Android Share buttons you'll find in nearly every app or a full-featured file manager — and it can automatically sync to your computer. Add a file to your cloud storage on your computer and it'll appear in the appropriate app on your phone so you can access it from there. Transfer Photos (and Screenshots) With Dropbox, Google Plus, OneDrive, and More Photo transfers are even easier than file transfers. Many apps can automatically upload photos you take to a cloud storage service, where they'll be synchronized to your computer wirelessly. For example, Dropbox and Microsoft OneDrive both have an "auto-upload" feature that will automatically upload photos you take, and they'll be synced straight to your PC so you can access them where you need them. Google Plus also has a similar automatic photo upload feature, but the photos you upload will be sent to Google+ Photos and not downloaded automatically to your PC. These applications treat screenshots the same way, too. You can take a screenshot of your Android phone and it will be automatically uploaded to your cloud storage account and downloaded straight to your computer without any additional taps on your screen, much less a cable. Use ADB Commands Over a Wireless Connection RELATED: How to Install and Use ADB, the Android Debug Bridge Utility Even the ADB command — intended for developers, but also used by enthusiasts who need to unlock root and do various other powerful things to their phones — can be used wirelessly if you don't want keep your phone connected to a computer. Unfortunately, this does require a cable to establish the connection. But, after you have, you can disconnect the cable and continue using adb commands wirelessly until you end the adb connection. That means you can control and manipulate your phone from your computer without the cable. Google's official adb documentation offers instructions for using adb wirelessly. Charge Your Phone Wirelessly (or Use a Dock) RELATED: How Does Wireless Charging Work? Quite a few Android phones have built-in wireless charging hardware, so you may not even have to plug in your phone when it's time to juice up its battery. Just get a compatible wireless charger and place your phone on the wireless charger to charge it. Phones like Google's own Nexus phones integrate this, and there are ways to add on wireless charging even if your phone doesn't have it. There's always the option of a wireless charging case — a case you put your phone in to gain wireless charging — and Samsung's phones with removable plastic backs and batteries can also often have their backs swapped out for hardware that's compatible with wireless charging. Wireless charging is cool and futuristic, but it is less efficient, slower, and surprisingly finicky. You really need to set the phone on the charger in a certain place. You could always skip all that and get a dock you can insert your phone into when it's time to charge. Get Bluetooth Headphones RELATED: Bluetooth Low Energy Explained: How New Types of Wireless Gadgets Are Now Possible You might still find yourself connecting a pair of headphones to your phone when you need to listen to something, but you don't have to! You could use a pair of Bluetooth headphones or earbuds to listen to everything wirelessly and avoid all the tangled headphone cables. You will have to charge the Bluetooth headphones, which is the trade-off. But Bluetooth headphones are getting better and better. Thanks to technologies like Bluetooth low energy, we're now starting to see wireless earbuds. Some companies were showing them off at CES 2015, and they'll hopefully come to market this year. If you want to live in the wire-free future, you can start today. The next time you're about to pull out a USB cable — or even a charging cable or headphone cable — think about it for a moment. You can probably do what you want to do without the wire. Image Credit: vagueonthehow on Flickr, Sylvain Naudin on Flickr, Vernon Chan on Flickr, brett jordan on Flickr Alright, let's get this out of the way right away: The simple notion of a "smart" fridge is a little eye-rolly, but smart appliances are a thing and they're becoming more of a thing each day. While you might not see having one in your home any time soon, some folks already do, and others are looking to add the smart tech to their dwellings.Let's take a look at a couple of the reasons you'd want to have yet another Wi-Fi connected device in your home. I forget … did I already buy milk? If you find yourself wondering what the heck you've got in your fridge after you've already left for the store, you might like to know that there's a trend developing: smart fridges with built-in cameras!Using a separate smartphone app, you can get a quick look at what's inside your fridge (looks like I did already buy milk) no matter where you are! It's not something you need to use every day, but it's nice to know you've got a backup plan that doesn't involve multiple trips to the store.Many of the newest models of smart fridges (like those just announced at CES 2017) feature wide-angle cameras. If I had to guess, I'd say it's likely to catch on.LG's upcoming Smart InstaView refrigerator (opens in new tab) will feature built-in cameras.□□ Refrigerator magnets are so last year(s)When you've got a gigantic internet-connected touchscreen on your fridge, you don't really need refrigerator magnets and papers.Appliance manufacturers see these things (fridges) as the center of the family home. Many people use the fridge as a bulletin board for their family — leaving a note on the fridge means everyone sees it at some point.With the technology packed into these appliances, you're not only seeing notes from mom — you're seeing the weather forecast, the date you put those now-brown oranges in the fridge, calendars, photos, recipes, a shopping list, etc.Your fridge becomes what amounts to a multi-user tablet for communicating with others and accessing information online. I don't care what anyone says, that's friggin' cool. When you consider manufacturers have started to add built-in speakers to their smart fridges, it's easy to see how the fridge could become another point of entertainment for the home.Samsung's working on a next-gen smart fridge with its Family Hub 2.0 technology, but its current generation Family Hub fridge already has many of the features I mentioned.See at The Home Depot (opens in new tab) Hey fridge, tell me how to make stew!LG is putting the smart in smart fridge with its upcoming LG Smart InstaView refrigerator because it'll include a smart assistant: Amazon Alexa!You'll be able to use the Alexa voice assistant as you would with an Echo or Echo Dot, which means you can easily ask for a recipe, order groceries from Amazon, command your smart home products, update your shopping list, play music, and more — all with your voice.The company is also including its webOS smart platform which it says you'll be able to use to track expiration dates, peruse recipes, and leave notes for family members.It also helps that the touchscreen display is a massive 29 inches in size. You can leave a lot of passive aggressive notes. ☺Learn more☕ Get your java going without getting out of bedGE pointed me to its GE WiFi Connect line of smart appliances which includes an internet-connected fridge.You can use the GE Kitchen app to get the hot water boiling for your morning cuppa joe (or tea), adjust the temperature of the fridge, receive alerts if you accidentally leave the door open, and more.The appliances also feature IFTTT integrations, which makes for a whole 'nother layer of home automation fun. Right, OK, but do we need smart fridges?No. No you don't. But I know I'd like to have one! Talking to your fridge about the weather, your commute, a recipe, or your schedule may seem a little strange, even to me, but when you consider the centrality of the fridge in your home and life … well, it kind of makes sense! I've always used the fridge as a communication location — there's a whiteboard on my fridge right now with notes for my partner.Ditching the whiteboard and adding in music, Alexa, expiration warnings, built-in cameras, and did I mention Alexa? That sounds awesome to me, and I imagine it also sounds awesome to those folks who are connecting their phones to their fridges. Does it sound awesome to you?Where do you stand on the whole "smart fridge" thing? Could you see adding the smart appliance to your life? Think it's the most ridiculous thing since Wi-Fi lightbulbs? Let me know in the comments below or shoot me a tweet!Questions about home automation, HomeKit, iOS Home app, etc.?If you've got any connected-living, smart home, home automation, or HomeKit questions, I would be pleased as punch to answer them for you!
